

Too many rules, little wisdom, and even less satisfaction

Claudia Vega

MD

When it comes to choosing what to eat in order to improve or maintain good health, everybody has something different to say. From a social gathering to a magazine article, we usually hear some sort of information regarding “the” best way to eat, a healthier diet, or the latest news about nutrition.

These nutrition recommendations or food rules tend to present black-and-white, absolute messages about good foods and bad foods. They also tend toward labels, like vegetarian, omnivore, organic, sugar free, and so on. And finally, they present dichotomies: dieting versus eating intuitively; the latest diet versus what we think was eaten in Paleolithic times; even eating mindfully versus mindlessly!

Not only are these messages confusing, but also they can take away the pleasure and ease that comes from what normally is an enjoyable, nurturing and daily activity, of eating to nourish our bodies and souls (except in unfortunate situations where access to food is limited).

Most of us already have too many rules that are supposed to help us live better. The trouble with food rules is that many of them are not even based on scientific facts. They promote a sense of inadequacy about ourselves, our bodies, and our behaviors. They also cause stress and promote a distorted relationship with food and eating. Worse still, we tend to transmit them generation after generation. It is no surprise that children eight years old or younger are showing up in the clinic with disordered eating behaviors.

The trouble with food and eating rules is that many of them are not even based on scientific facts. They promote a sense of inadequacy about ourselves, our bodies, and our behaviors.

The Center for Mindful Eating promotes eating mindfully, a practice that can help us become aware of our relationship with food and eating. By focusing on our principles and values, instead of rules, we discover an invitation to use our senses to savor food with curiosity rather than fear, shame, or guilt; to explore our eating habits with attention and compassion rather than judgment, and to listen to and cultivate our own inner wisdom, perhaps with the intention to take better care of ourselves.

From this perspective, there are few (if any) external food rules that are worthy of our attention. If you are the kind of person who likes to follow food rules anyway, you may want to consider the following ones:

1) Eat a variety of natural food and less processed food.

2) Attend to your inner cues of hunger and satiety.

3) Eat slowly and use your senses to savor food.

4) Choose foods that help you take care of yourself, others, and our planet.

5) Avoid rules that make you feel restricted and disconnected from your body.

6) Be mindful of the impact of the rules you pass onto your children.

7) Nourish your body with wholesome food and your soul with love, happiness, and compassion.

Claudia Vega, MD, MS, TCME Board member. Pediatrician, psychotherapist, and nutritionist specializing in mindfulness and mindful eating for children and families. Claudia can be reached at claudiavega@nutrintegra.com